But our errand to this estate to-day is a practical one, and we must not permit our admiration of its beautiful surroundings to divert us long from its accomnlishment. So after an hour of fruit trik, during which dinner is served, we set out under the agreeable escent of the proprietor and his two sons to make a survey of the orchards. We are first-led through an orchard north of the house occupying some eight aeres between that and the end of the point, and including three hundred and fifty trees planted in 1864. This is Mr. Holmes' small beginning. The varieties are mainly Greenings and Golden Russets. The trees are uniformly healthy and vigorous, and give evidence of intelligent and constant care. This is an aid to his fruit growing which the proprietor proposes freely to employ. He wintered for this summer's work thirty-five hogs. This particular orchard had been seeded to orchard grass the previous year, and the forage it furnished, to support the herd while confined here. At present they are in a distant orchard feeding on the peas, which had been there grown for them, and fattening ou them. Mr. Holmes at tone time tried keeping sheep in his young orchards, but they persisted, with an abundance of pasturage, in gnawing the bark of the trees, and even after he had been at pains to surround the trees with a protection of boards nailed to stakes, they climbed upon the harden and the sample to stakes, they climbed upon the harden and the sample to surround the trees with a protection of boards nailed to stakes, they climbed upon the harden and the sample tracts usually, and the foreact of the most how any relish for apple.
